REVIEW

Killer comedy and people in 'Jeopardy'

Matthew J. Palm
The Artistic Type

Today's Orlando Fringe Festival reviews: "Dandelion: A Comedy About Fatherhood," "The Family Crow: A Murder Mystery" (Highly recommended), "I Lost on Jeopardy" (Highly recommended), "Idealistic" (Highly recommended), "Shakespeare's Aliens" and "Triple Bypass."

The narrator of "The Family Crow: A Murder Mystery" (Brown, 60 minutes, highly recommended) warns us that the ensuing tale is "not for the faint of heart." In fact, the performance is for anyone who appreciates a creative vision, superb execution, a dollop of weirdness — and, of course, eye-rolling puns. Adam Francis Proulx won a Critics' Choice Award for his "Baker's Dozen: 12 Angry Puppets" in which a single puppet embodied a slew of characters. This time, the puppet — a remarkable monocle-wearing crow — is a single character, on the scene to investigate a murder. The human Proulx plays the other members of the dead man's family as the case progresses.

It's a daffy mixture of Agatha Christie meets "Airplane" with exchanges like:

Disgruntled military man addressed by the wrong title: "That's general."

Instant reply: "No, it's quite specific, Sir."

The silliness is delivered at a rapid clip and with a knowing twinkle by Proulx. A murder mystery, even one played for laughs, depends on atmosphere — and "The Family Crow" delivers, with a parade of sound cues (original music is by Alexander Baerg), inspired lighting from a semicircle of desk lamps and a fine, feathery costume by Jessica Smith.

Eyron L. Lavolette's direction, with Proulx's laugh-stocked script, deftly balances the mystery with the comedy. And in the finest British-mystery tradition, the Sherlock Crowlines detective (see I can do it, too) explains it all at the end.

It's self-deprecating, self-aware and some seriously funny highblying fun.

"Idealistic" (Brown, 60 minutes) is also cone-red with death — namely what we think when the moment arrives and we look back on our lives.

Steven Andrews' one-man show looks at how his medical career has helped him adjust his own outlook on life and its hopes and dreams. The storytelling lacks structure, and dramatically the show comes to an end rather than builds to an end.

Yet "Idealistic" has multiple anecdotes of interest, introduces interesting characters and raises engaging ideas. Andrews himself is easy to watch, quick to gain the audience's sympathy and passionate about his ideas. It's also relatable, especially to anyone who has struggled with insecurity or depression.

Really, what is it this year with the Fringe and death?

"Triple Bypass" (Purple, 45 minutes)

consists of three short plays by Deena M.P. Romayne dealing with the subject. As clearly directed by Monica Long Tamborello, the strongest is the first one

— a gripping look at a dying man with an appalling

past and the stranger who arrives as a guardian angel

... or angel of vengeance? Terry Olson and Sarah

Mathews do fine work in a story that it would be fascinating to see expanded.

In a second piece, Dina Najjar and Jennifer

Coe also create memorable characterizations as two celebrities you might recognize waiting for the afterlife to get rocking, and Romayne supplies a searing rant against the music industry. The third piece, about a black widow spider and other bugs, takes a turn to the absurd and seems wildly out of place with the other two.

Still more death: The folks behind previous Shakespearean takes on "Reservoir Dogs" and

"Ghostbusters" present "Shakespeare's Aliens"

(The Abbey, 60 minutes), written with a light touch and even a few poetic moments by David Strauss.

Shakespeare built will recognize lines of dialogue and hear familiar titles name-dropped. "Aliens"

fans will enjoy watching the plot play out and

Alan Ostrander's creatures. Director John Reid

Adams lets the audience see his cast having fun — especially Katherine Riddle, who's all darting eyes and portentous warnings as young Newton. "Mostly at night they doth come ...

More?"

Rob Del Medico is a hook in Hudson, with his emotions always dialed up to 11. Reducing the story to its plot essentials leaves Lyn

Adams' triple mostly yelling, but the soundscape of hissing, screeching, dripping and crunching helps convey the tension of the film. It's good fun.

With a completely different tone, Aaron Malkin explores a mystery here on Earth: How do you explain the bond that forms between father and son?

Steven Andrews stars in "Idealistic" at the Orlando Fringe Festival.

In his "Dandelion: A Comedy About Fatherhood" (Silver, 60 minutes) Malkin explains it quite well, not by talking about that bond per se but by showing it to us with gentle reminiscences about his own young son.

There's a tenderness in Malkin's style that lets you see the ams of fatherly love around him. He lightly touches on the difficult issue with his own father and do funny things. But Malkin, half of the popular

James & James clowning duo, has the skill to make this more than "see what little Julian did."

Finally, George Burd's "I Lost on Jeopardy" (Pink,

60 minutes, highly recommended) is a treat for fans

of the TV show, full of behind-the-scenes details.

But more than that, it's a guide map for life — about following dreams, the importance of challenging

ourselves and especially how to react if the dream eludes us. And it's funny. Burd elicits instant empathy — we all know the feeling of coming so close, right? — and he deftly conveys his personal story among headier issues. It's a beautiful paradox that a show in which the performer states and restates, "The only thing guaranteed in life is failure" is so hopeful.

Burd doesn't say if performing at Fringe Festivals is his latest personal challenge. But if that's the case, he's a champion.
